The Measure of Goodness: The Virtuous Human and the Citizen Animal

Examining Committee: Wolfgang R. Mann (sponsor), Richard Kraut, Lydia Goehr, Elizabeth Scharffenberger, Taylor Carman

Abstract: How does Aristotle's ethics differ from a rule-based one? I propose a phronimos-centric account of virtuous action. The virtuous person not only has unique epistemic access to what is good, but also serves as a standard for what is good for a human being. I argue that this is not relativism, but a kind of constitutivism. Extending this to the political realm, I argue that the polis is a necessary condition for a flourishing life, because the political life of a full-fledged citizen in a full-fledged polis is the telos and maturation of the human form of life. As much as Aristotle's ethics is teleologically prior to his ideal constitutional design by providing the goals of education, his ideal constitutional design is nonetheless prior by giving substance to his ethics. His ethics is shaped by the common good of the citizenry. I conclude my dissertation with a critical analysis of Aristotle's citizenship: the human being, qua "the citizenship animal," is a normative notion, a status conferred by the polis on the basis of socio-economic factors. The overly intimate relationship between being human and being a citizen risks dehumanization.
